Anastasia Zamaraeva

Artist statement

I think we often stop thinking about context because we are constantly inside it. Something already seems self-evident – but what is it, in itself, that makes it so evident? I am interested in how context shapes our world and our perception. For example, can a person be non-anthropocentric? I do not mean whether we ought to overcome anthropocentrism, but whether it is even possible to step outside the human perspective.

Language helps a great deal with thinking about this. Firstly, because reasoning without language is rather difficult, and secondly, because language is, in a way, a long and slightly tangled but revealing instruction manual for the contemporary human.

When thinking about perception, I often create interactive works. I enjoy considering the experience and expectations people bring to a work, and playing with them during the interaction. Ideally, I would like to give people positive emotions.

I experiment with technology as best I can: 3D, neural networks, electronics, and so on. Sometimes an idea leads me to a tool; sometimes a tool suggests what I want to say. I enjoy making unexpected connections and figuring out exactly what makes them unexpected.